The election of Barack Obama as the first African-descended president of the United States in 2008 was greeted with euphoria in the U.S. and around the world, including Africa. Little, however, changed in the substance of U.S.-Africa relations. This underscores the limits of the symbolic politics of race and presidential personalities in the face of the structural imperatives of U.S. power and foreign policy in which African interests remain marginal and subordinate to U.S. interests. The article explores the structural contexts of foreign policymaking in the United States and what might be expected from the second Obama administration.

Related Articles

'This Is Our Time' (articles/35482577/this-our-time), Gibbs, Nancy; Fitzpatrick, Laura // Time International (Atlantic Edition); 11/17/2008, Vol. 172 Issue 20, p24
This article discusses the 2008 campaign of president elect Barack Obama. The role played by factors such as the youth vote, campaign finance, an economic crisis and Obama's temperament as a candidate in the election is addressed. Questions are raised about whether or not the political momentum...

'This Is Our Time' (articles/35212951/this-our-time), Gibbs, Nancy; Fitzpatrick, Laura // Time International (Atlantic Edition); 11/17/2008, Vol. 172 Issue 20, p20
This article discusses the 2008 campaign of president elect Barack Obama. The role played by factors such as the youth vote, campaign finance, an economic crisis and Obama's temperament as a candidate in the election is addressed. Questions are raised about whether or not the political momentum...

'This Is Our Time' (articles/35188844/this-our-time), Gibbs, Nancy; With reporting by: Fitzpatrick, Laura // Time; 11/17/2008, Vol. 172 Issue 20, p28
This article discusses the 2008 campaign of president elect Barack Obama. The role played by factors such as the youth vote, campaign finance, an economic crisis and Obama's temperament as a candidate in the election is addressed. Questions are raised about whether or not the political momentum...

The author presents her opinion on the announcement of Barrack Obama on his plan to run for the U.S. presidency. She asserts that Obama's announcement confirmed that he believes in the basic decency of the U.S. people. She cites that Obama forthrightly decried a smallness of the U.S. politics...

The author deals with the impact of the demographic change on the U.S. political landscape in 2008. He provides the electorate's demographic groups: white voters with at least a four-year college degree; white voters without a college degree; African-Americans; Hispanics; Asians; and other...

Before the euphoria that accompanied the election of Barack Obama in November 2008 could subside in the months following his election, some observers of the United States’ Africa policy were optimistically pondering whether the Obama Presidency will depart from where United States foreign...

An essay is presented on Pan-Africanism and the presidency of U.S. president Barack Obama. The author argues that Obama entered office in 2009 with exceedingly high expectations that could not be met because of what he calls the disastrous policies of the administration of former U.S. president...

Inbox. Goldey, Gail; McLaughlin, Kelly; Kastelic, Jeffrey C.; Melchione, Linda Calcagno; Capehart, Lynn; Shepherd, Margie; Liffey, Robert; Attanasio, Tony; Jaeger, Renate; Coppin, Ronald; Johnson, Peter A.; Hoebling, Walter W.; Larkin, Ronald; Zeleznak, Jan; Terry, Peter; Percy, Richard; Sheafer, Rick // Time International (Atlantic Edition); 11/24/2008, Vol. 172 Issue 21, p6

Several letters to the editor are presented in response to articles in previous issues, including “Here Be Monsters” by Mike Murphy, “The Lost Leader” by Michael Elliott and “Exclusive: Joe Klein Grills Obama,” from the November 3, 2008 issue.