Why Jubilee party is not just about 2017 polls

In 1998, after the 1997 election, President Daniel Moi's KANU and Raila Odinga's NUP ran against the common interest of being elected to government. Since the election, Moi's party has continued to be in power, with Raila's party, the National Super Alliance (NASA), in the opposition. The relationship between the two parties has been tense, with Moi's party accused of using its influence to suppress opposition candidates. This has led to a situation where the opposition is left with no clear path forward.

The current situation in Kenya is one of political polarization, with the two parties, KANU and NASA, locked in a constant battle for power. The upcoming 2017 election is seen as a decisive moment, with both parties vying for control of the government.

The election is expected to be one of the most contested in Kenya's history, with both sides deploying massive resources to ensure victory. The situation has led to a heightened sense of tension, with fear of violence and unrest growing.

The election is also seen as a test of Kenya's democratic process, with the country's future hanging in the balance. The outcome of the election will determine the direction the country will take in the years to come.

In conclusion, the 2017 election in Kenya is a critical moment for the country, with the whole nation eagerly awaiting the result. The election is expected to be one of the most contested in Kenya's history, with both sides deploying massive resources to ensure victory.
